As soon might common sense ir sist that the foulest miasma was the most conducive to We are much indebted to Philanthropia for health. One decisive evidence there is, that all men of same minds and hearts feel gambling to be wrong, while the most degraded of other classes are at times recognized as proper objects of charity, no man ever felt a gambler to have any claim upon his amiable munificence. Gambling is then utterly at war with our social responsibilities-is fraudulent and dishonest as a means of acquiring property.

A second argument for the pernicious social tendencies of gaming is, that it rains multitudes of men, and seriously injutes multitudes more. By this I mean, it is the occasion of numerous entire, and multitudes of partial bankrupteies of property. The history of gambling is a history of rained fortunee! And this is not a casual but necessary result. The whole affair is a conflict for the exclusive possession of given property.
